

National standards may be fine in some cases, but in this case, the FCC should leave the Telephone Privacy law to the states. Indiana's law has worked extremely well from my standpoint and any national law that lowers the standard below what I now enjoy would be most unwelcome. We used to receive solicitations on a regular basis - during the day (I was amazed if I was home for some reason during the week on the number of solicitors who called), in the evening (normally at dinner time), and Sunday, especially in the evening. I hated getting the Sunday calls. There seemed to be no escape. Since signing on to Indiana's Telephone Privacy law, the number of calls have dropped dramatically. It was quite a relief. We still get some, but not nearly as many and the credit card and bank calls have virtually dried up. Please do not put us back in our previous situation. Leave well enough alone, or give the states the option of choosing the FCC's standard, or implementing their own. I believe the people of Indiana will stick with our current law. Thank you.
